In a significant reshuffle of his foreign policy team, President Donald Trump has nominated Republican Congressman Mike Waltz as the next U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations. The appointment follows Waltz's resignation from his recent role as National Security Adviser, a position he held for less than a year.

Waltz, a former Green Beret and staunch Trump ally, is known for his assertive views on national defense and a hawkish stance toward U.S. adversaries. His selection signals a continuation of Trump's hardline diplomatic posture, particularly in relation to China, Iran, and multilateral organizations that the former president has frequently criticized.

Analysts view the move as part of Trump's broader effort to reinforce loyalty among top officials and align his foreign policy with campaign promises made during the 2024 election. Waltz's military credentials and legislative experience are expected to bring both battlefield credibility and political sharpness to the UN stage.

The nomination has sparked debate in Washington, with Democrats expressing concern over Waltz's confrontational rhetoric and skepticism toward global institutions. Supporters, however, argue that he will bring clarity and strength to America's voice on the international front amid rising geopolitical tensions.

If confirmed by the Senate, Waltz will succeed Ambassador Linda Thomas-Greenfield, reinstating Trump's preferred leadership at the UN. With the GOP holding a Senate majority, confirmation hearings are expected to proceed swiftly.

Waltz's nomination underscores Trump's commitment to projecting U.S. strength abroad while keeping a firm grip on his diplomatic and national security agenda.
