Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelenskyy has announced his plan to travel to Turkey for proposed peace talks with Russian President Vladimir Putin. The talks, scheduled for May 15 in Istanbul, are expected to focus on de-escalating the ongoing conflict and exploring paths toward a peaceful resolution.

Zelenskyy's visit to Turkey will also include a meeting with Turkish President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan in Ankara, where regional stability and diplomatic solutions are likely to be prioritized.

The Ukrainian leader has emphasized that Putin's participation would signify a genuine commitment to peace and a willingness to negotiate.

While Ukraine is prepared for direct dialogue, the Kremlin has yet to confirm Putin's attendance.

Despite the uncertainty, Zelenskyy remains optimistic that the talks can pave the way for meaningful progress. He stressed that the world is watching, and a missed opportunity for dialogue could further intensify tensions.

This initiative follows recent international calls for de-escalation, with global leaders urging both sides to prioritize diplomacy over conflict. The proposed talks are seen as a critical step towards reducing hostilities and setting the stage for broader negotiations.

As preparations for the meeting continue, expectations are high that a successful dialogue could serve as a turning point in the conflict, leading to lasting peace and stability in the region.

The international community remains watchful, hopeful that the Istanbul meeting may mark a significant step toward ending hostilities.
