In a pivotal move towards ending the ongoing conflict in Ukraine, Ukrainian President Volodymyr Zelenskyy is preparing for potential peace talks with Russian President Vladimir Putin, set to take place in Turkey. The meeting, which is expected to serve as a significant diplomatic breakthrough, comes after months of escalating tensions between the two countries.

The Turkish government has offered to host the talks, marking its continued role as a mediator in the conflict. Both Zelenskyy and Putin are expected to discuss key issues, including a potential ceasefire, the withdrawal of troops, and the long-term status of Ukraine, which has been fighting Russian forces since the invasion began in February 2022.

The talks are seen as a critical step in finding a peaceful resolution to the war, with international pressure mounting for both sides to engage in meaningful dialogue. While the specifics of the agenda remain undisclosed, experts believe that Turkey's neutral stance and diplomatic influence make it an ideal location for such high-stakes negotiations.

Zelenskyy, who has been calling for peace talks for several months, has emphasized that Ukraine's territorial integrity and sovereignty will remain non-negotiable. Meanwhile, Putin's willingness to engage in dialogue is viewed as a sign of Russia's desire to end the war, although it remains unclear what concessions Moscow is prepared to make.

The outcome of this meeting could have significant implications for the future of the region, with the world watching closely to see if this will lead to a breakthrough or further escalate the conflict.
