Former US President Joe Biden has been diagnosed with aggressive prostate cancer, according to an official statement released by the White House. The announcement sparked concerns globally, with messages of support pouring in from political leaders and public figures.

The White House Press Secretary stated that Biden's medical team is actively assessing his condition and formulating a comprehensive treatment plan. "The former President remains in good spirits and is determined to continue fulfilling his commitments,” she added, emphasizing that Biden’s health is being closely monitored.

Prostate cancer is one of the most common cancers among men, and its aggressive form can pose serious health challenges. Experts indicate that early detection and timely medical intervention are crucial for managing the disease effectively.

Political analysts believe Biden’s health condition could influence future political engagements and public appearances. The White House, however, reassured that his schedule remains largely unchanged, with adjustments made only when necessary.

Support for Biden poured in from both sides of the political spectrum, with several global leaders extending their well-wishes for his recovery. Biden, known for his resilience and determination, has reportedly expressed his commitment to continue his responsibilities with the same vigor
