Moscow, October 15 (QNA) – Russian President Vladimir Putin discussed today with his Syrian counterpart, Ahmed Al Sharaa, who is visiting Russia, ways to enhance bilateral relations and strategic cooperation between the two countries in various fields.

During the meeting, both sides emphasized the importance of strengthening relations and maintaining stability in the region.

The Russian President stressed the importance of resuming the work of the Russian-Syrian Joint Governmental Commission, which began in 1993, noting that many important issues have been identified and that great efforts are being made to implement them.

For his part, the Syrian President said that his country respects all previous agreements, adding that they are trying to restore and redefine the nature of these relations, while ensuring the independence of the Syrian situation and national sovereignty.

He emphasized that the safety, territorial integrity, and security of Syria are linked to regional and global stability.

Syrian President Ahmed Al Sharaa arrived in Russia for talks with his Russian counterpart, Vladimir Putin, on bilateral relations between the two countries and regional and international developments of mutual interest.
