Former President Donald Trump announced he will give his “complete and unyielding support” to a primary challenger running against Congresswoman Marjorie Taylor Greene in her Georgia district. Trump’s social media post claimed that many conservative voters are frustrated with Greene’s conduct and antics and that, if the “right person” runs, he will back them fully.

In reaction, Greene told The Hill that Trump's remarks "put my life in danger," emphasizing the personal risks she believes come with this public political spat. The publication also highlighted several issues fueling the feud, including policy disagreements and internal GOP tensions, which have strained the once-strong alliance between Greene and Trump.

Trump's endorsement signals his continued influence over Republican primaries and could significantly shape the race in Greene's district. Political analysts note that his support for a challenger may encourage other contenders to enter and could shift voter sentiment among conservatives who are increasingly divided over Greene's leadership style.

As the primary approaches, the rivalry illustrates growing tensions within the GOP and underscores Trump's pivotal role in shaping internal party contests. Observers will closely watch how Greene responds and whether his backing ultimately determines the outcome of the Georgia race.
