Donald Trump said on Thursday that the ongoing war in Iran is progressing “very well” and could conclude soon. Speaking at an event in Las Vegas, he expressed confidence in the direction of the conflict, echoing earlier remarks predicting a swift end to hostilities. Trump described the military campaign as “perfect” and highlighted what he called the unmatched strength of the United States military.

He reiterated that operations launched by the United States and Israel in late February have demonstrated overwhelming power and effectiveness. The president maintained an optimistic outlook, suggesting that the situation is under control and moving toward resolution in the near future.
