Washington, August 25: The United States has begun returning personnel to some diplomatic missions in the Middle East that were evacuated during the Iran war, marking a cautious step toward restoring normal diplomatic operations in the region.

According to Reuters, US officials are preparing to redeploy staff to several embassies after security concerns prompted earlier evacuations. The move comes as Washington continues to assess the regional security situation and its wider diplomatic engagement.

The return of personnel is expected to strengthen US diplomatic operations and allow American missions to resume broader services where security conditions permit.

The development follows months of heightened tensions involving Iran and the United States, which have affected regional security, energy markets and international diplomacy.

Washington is also facing pressure to balance security concerns with the need to maintain diplomatic channels across the Middle East. Officials are expected to continue monitoring developments before expanding the number of personnel returning to affected missions.

The cautious reopening of diplomatic facilities could signal a gradual adjustment in US policy following the conflict, although significant security and political challenges remain.
